Perfect Chinese Children by Vanessa Woods is an autobiographical short story published in the Growing Up Asian in Australia (Pung, 2008), a collection of prose, poetry and comics by Asian-Australian authors, edited by the award-winning author Alice Pung. The book was published by independent Australian publisher Black Inc., and has been very popular among young adult readers, largely through its inclusion on the Victorian high school reading list. As the title suggests, the book is about childhood and memory, but more importantly, Asian-Australian life, as written by Asian-Australian authors. Through this book, Pung wanted to present and promote Asian-Australian culture to readers, in order to show that “not only what it is like to grow up Asian in Australia, but also what it means to be Asian Australian” (4).

Woods’ short story reflects a particular Chinese-Australian narrative. The author has a Chinese mother and Australian father, and grew up with her Chinese relatives, but as an “Australian child” (Pung 105). Inevitably, Woods experienced cultural differences and conflicts, as well as cultural interactions and conciliations. As a second-generation migrant, Woods tried to fit into mainstream Australian culture, whilst struggling to understand her own Chinese heritage. Like many other authors represented in this collection (such as Benjamin Law, Michelle Law and Tony Ayres, amongst others), Woods may be viewed as a “cultural translator”, who exists in-between cultures, identities and languages.

The concept of cultural translation was discussed by postcolonial theorist Homi K. Bhabha in The Location of Culture (1994); he argues that migrants translate their own culture and language into the host community and the receiving culture. Consequently, the receiving culture is intervened, transformed and hybridized, and the host language (in this case, English) becomes more diverse and hybrid (Young 2012). As the Indian-born British writer Salman Rushdie (1992) famously describes wrote: “Having been borne across the world, we are translated men” (16).

Bhabha also connected the notion of cultural translation with hybridity. He views hybridity as a result of cultural interactions and the notion of being “in-between” cultures. Migrant writing, including by Chinese-Australian authors, may be viewed as extremely hybrid and complex (Ang, 2001). Writers such as Woods and Rushdie often speak of their hybrid identities and cultures, which can be fluid and complex (Ang 2001). So-called “hybridity features” therefore become one of the most distinguishing characteristics of migrant stories. Hybridity features in the text create a sense of foreignness and unfamiliarity to the reader, which are often used by writers in order to highlight their position of in-betweenness (Simon 2001).

In Woods’ Perfect Chinese Children, hybridity features can be found on both cultural and linguistic levels. Cultural hybridity takes place when different cultures come into contact, reflecting cultural conflicts and differences. Linguistic hybridity, on the other hand, occurs when different languages exist in one text – this is often found in literature written by migrants (Bhabha, 1994). On a cultural level, Woods found herself in between two cultures and identities. She grew up with her Chinese mother and relatives, eating “dun tahts” and Peking duck, and going to Yum Cha every Saturday. But she does not look Chinese nor behave like a Chinese person, so she never quite fit in with her Chinese cousins. Moreover, she was not a perfect Chinese child to her mother. Woods was teetering in between her Chinese heritage and Australian culture, stating “Australians are dog shit” (Pung 107) but then telling her mother she wanted “erasers with Snow White on them” (Pung 110). She also witnessed the conflicts between two cultures and races – her Aunty viewed white people as barbarians, while her cousins were bullied because they were Asian. On a linguistic level, she admitted that she could only speak three Cantonese phrases, but Chinese words and references are still predominant through the text. Whether the author can speak or write Chinese, Chinese culture and language are deeply embedded in her English writing.

Hybridity features in both linguistic and cultural forms can, however, pose difficulties in translation, therefore the translation process and strategies are worth examining. Additionally, as the Chinese heritage or the “Chineseness” of the author thrives through the text, it leads to the translation issue of “back translation”. Back translation takes place when translating the Chinese words, concepts, names and culture from the source text (ST) into the Chinese target text (TT). Different strategies have been adopted in order to translate and back translate the hybridity features in the text. However, some hybridity features found in the ST are lost in the TT, while others, interestingly, have emerged during the translation process. For example, “cha siu bao” and “dun tahts” might be unfamiliar to some Australian readers, but it would be familiar to Chinese audiences. On the other hand, “Jesus Christ” is used as a common swearing word in English, but it can create a strange effect in Chinese.

The overall strategy employed relies on Antoine Berman’s theory of “deformation” (2000), which is used to highlight the unfamiliarity and foreignness in the TT, and to reflect the foreignness and hybridity features in the ST. I have also used Nida’s (1964) equivalence theory, as this translation has attempted to create “equivalent hybridity” in the TT. There are several translation methods/procedures identified by Vinay and Darbelnet (1995), including the notion of borrowing, which has been adopted in the translation to reflect the hybridity features and hybrid nature of the ST. Through borrowing or “zero translation” (Qiu, 2001) strategy, some words and phrases of the ST are left untranslated and kept in the source language. Examples are provided below to demonstrate some of these translation challenges and strategies.

As already mentioned, Cantonese words and Chinese cultural concepts are heavily employed in the ST; these foreign words are used to highlight the author’s hybrid identity. In my translation, I have adopted the strategy of borrowing or “zero translation” for most of the Cantonese phrases such as: “Kung Hei Fat Choi” “lycee” and “gno sat neyko say yun tow”. They were not presented in the ST using standardized Cantonese spelling, as Woods has limited knowledge of Cantonese. Therefore, to retain the effect and meaning of the original terms in the TT, borrowing was deemed the best approach. It will not create confusions for the reader as explanations are already provided in the text; for example, the author explained what “lycee” is: “red envelopes stuffed with cash” (Pung 103). Keeping the term “lycee” untranslated will retains the foreignness of the ST. However, for other terms like “Aunty Yee Mah”, I cannot use the same strategy. As “Yee Mah” means “aunty” in Cantonese, translating directly or borrowing completely would make it redundant or meaningless in Chinese. Therefore, I have translated it as “Aunty” (yi ma) which has a similar pronunciation as “Yee Mah”.

In the story, Woods describes the challenges and conflicts between culture, family and inter-racial marriage. When her father’s family meet her mother for the first time, the reaction was “Jesus Christ – a chongalewy-chow Sheila!” (Pung 105). This sentence contains a swear word, a made-up (hybrid English/Cantonese) term, a racial reference and Australian slang. This hybrid combination created a huge challenge for translation. The sentence might seem strange or unfamiliar to English readers, but the purpose and effect, and I wanted to create a similar level of strangeness in the TT. Therefore, I adopted an equally hybrid and creative approach, using the equivalence Chinese term for “Jesus Christ” and “Sheila”, while for “chongalewy-chow”, I chose “清洁啦虫” (Ching Ga La Chong) for the meaning and sound.

Perfect Chinese Children is a beautiful and touching story, but is, at the same time, complicated and meaningful. Woods, as a Chinese-Australian writer and “cultural translator”, honestly reflects what is like to grow up in Australia as a Chinese-Australian child, and as a person in between cultures and identities. It is a personal and unique story, which also imparts many universal feelings and experiences. The text is worth translating into Chinese for Chinese readers who do not understand what it means to be Chinese-Australian, but also for readers who may share similar experiences.

If there was ever anyone I wanted to stab in the heart with a chopstick, it was my cousin David.

‘What happened to the four per cent?’ my mother says, looking at my maths exam.

‘I got ninety-six. What else do you want?’

‘Don’t talk back,’ my mother snaps. ‘Ninety-six isn’t 100. If you want to do well you have to try harder. David just got 99.9 on his HSC.’

I dig my nails into my chair and wait for the punchline.

‘He asked me to ring up the school board and contest the score. Ha! Imagine that. The lady on the phone laughed.’

My mother shakes her head in wonder, as though David is the god of a new religion she’s following.

‘It really was 100,’ she says confidentially. ‘They had to scale it down for the school.’

Usually Chinese par-ents don’t have bragging rights over other people’s children, but my mother tutored David through high school, so his HSC score is her crowning victory.

My maths exam, with the scrawled red ‘96’ that I was so proud of, begins to look ratty. Untidy figures rush across the page as if they’re about to make a run for it. David’s handwriting is famous for looking like it came out of a typewriter.

‘He’s going to medical school,’ she sighs. ‘He’s going to be a heart surgeon, just like Victor Chang.’

The reason my mother harps on about David so much is probably that her own two children don’t warrant much praising over the mahjong table. My sister Bronnie has been expelled from piano lessons twice, and me, well, I am trouble on all fronts. I’m the child who talks back and gives viperous looks to her elders. In all my life I’ve only learnt two Cantonese phrases: Kung Hei Fat Choi, Happy New Year (saying this at the right time earned you lyece, red envelopes stuffed with cash), and gno sat neyko say yun tow, a phrase I hear often from my Aunty Yee Mah that roughly translates to ‘I will chop off your dead man’s head.’

‘Jasmine just bought her mother a $600,000 apartment in Hong Kong,’ mother says wistfully before going for the touchdown. ‘In cash.’

Jasmine is David’s perfect sibling. She is a stockbroker in New York, married to an investment banker. The photographer at her Sydney wedding cost $12,000.

‘Jasmine only got 80 per cent on her HSC.’ My mother looks hopeful, as though retards like me might have a chance after all. Then she shakes herself out of it. ‘But no one paid any attention to her until she started making money.’
My mother looks around our tiny two-bedroom apartment. The kitchen is fine if you’re a troll and enjoy dim, cramped spaces. The carpet is grey and curling around the edges. The furnishings are the type you pick up by the side of the road. There are occasional glimpses of the life we had before. A Ming vase. A black lacquered screen with flourishes of gold. But the priceless antiques give the apartment the ambience of a refugee camp, as though we managed to save a few precious things before catastrophe threw us into squalor.

When I visit my cousins in their two-storey palaces, their kitchens as big as our apartment and their lucky trees with lifesized peaches of jade in the foyer, my secret pleasure is to creep upstairs and press my face into the pale, plush carpet.

We are poor because my mother’s financial history has been overshadowed by unlucky four – sie, which sounds uncomfortably close to sei, death. She was the fourth child born in the fourth decade of the century. Her father gave all his money to Chiang Kai-shek, the Chinese leader of the Nationalist Party who lost China to the Communists in 1949. My mother’s brothers and sister were also left destitute, but they all married suitable Chinese spouses who helped them earn back the family fortune.

My mother, with her silken black hair and face like a doll, could have done better than anyone. But instead, she married my father, a gweilo, a ghost person, a white man. In our world, interracial marriages are unheard of. We don’t know any other Chinese who married Australians.

妈妈环顾我们狭小的两居室公寓。或许对于喜欢阴暗逼仄环境的小矮人来说，我们的厨房还算过得去。地毯发灰，边角卷起。家具像是从路边捡来的那种。偶尔也能瞥见过去生活的影子：一个明代花瓶，一面金纹黑漆屏风。但这些昂贵古董给公寓增添了一种难民营的气氛。仿佛在灾难来临流离失所之前，我们设法保住了几件值钱的东西。

表哥他们家住在如宫殿一样的两层别墅里。厨房和我们公寓一样大，门口招财树上挂着和真桃子一样大小的玉桃。我的秘密乐趣是偷偷地上楼，将脸埋进洁白的毛绒地毯里。

我们家很穷，是因为妈妈的财运一直被一个不吉利的数字笼罩着——四，听起来像“死”。她是本世纪家族中第四代的第四个孩子。她爸爸将所有的钱都给了国民党领袖蒋介石，1949年国民党溃败，共产党执政。妈妈的兄弟姐妹们都穷困潦倒，但他们与合适的中国人结婚，并重建了家业。

我的妈妈有着一头乌黑的秀发和洋娃娃般的脸蛋，她本该比别人都前途无量。然而，她却嫁给了我爸爸——一个“gweilo”，一个洋鬼子，一个白种人。在我们的世界
‘Barbarians,’ Yee Mah would say. ‘Chinese were using chopsticks while gweilos were eating with their hands.’

My father was a charming but troubled Vietnam vet, prone to occasional psychotic episodes and heavy drinking. When he brought my mother home to meet his family, my grandfather’s first words to her were, ‘Jesus Christ – a chongalewy-chow Sheila!’

My mother did everything required of a dutiful Chinese wife. She spent three hours baking dun tahts, the pastry as flaky around the warm egg custard as those served for the Kangxi Emperor at the Manchu imperial feast. She did the ritualistic two-day preparation for Peking duck and gave herself RSI from rolling perfectly circular Mandarin pancakes. She served orgasmic banquets to my father’s friends and unwittingly to his mistresses.

It wasn’t a surprise to anyone except my mother when my father divorced her and left her for a white barbarian when I was five and my sister was two.

My mother almost slit her wrists in shame. We didn’t know anyone who was divorced. Chinese spouses had affairs, slept in separate rooms and barely spoke to each other, but no one divorced. It was a matter of saving face.

Her own life in shreds and two dollars in her pocket, we became her only hope. We would be brilliant at school, earn accolades and awards until the day when we were educated, rich and could lavish her with the money and attention she deserved.

Unfortunately, it isn’t quite working out that way. As a result of the impure blood of my father, my sister and I don’t even look Chinese. We both have Chinese hair, dead straight and completely resistant to the crimping tools crucial to the ‘80s, but my sister’s hair is blonde and mine is the colour of burnt toast.

As time goes by, it becomes clear to her that we are going the way of Australian children. The ones who don’t work as hard, are loud and uncouth and, worst of all, talk back to their parents and hold chopsticks near the pointed ends, like peasants.

Until the divorce, we had barely seen my Chinese relatives. Suddenly, from our big, comfortable house in Turramurra, we were living in a troll cave in Kingsford near Vietnamese boat people. Instead of a mother who stayed home all day cooking delicious and exotic meals, I had a mother who worked as a secretary for fourteen hours a day. And every day after school, my sister and I get dumped with my Aunty Yee Mah and my three cousins.

It is well known among all my new relatives under the age of sixteen that you do not fuck with Yee Mah. Yee Mah isn’t fat but there is a heaviness to her. The back of her hand feels like a ton of bricks. She once broke a bed just by sitting on it. Besides the famous ‘I will chop off your dead man’s head,’ she sometimes pulls out a box of matches, holds one out close to our mouths and hisses, ‘If you are lying to me, I will burn out your tongue.’ In a way that convinces you she absolutely is not joking.

Her daughter Erica is seventeen and the high-achieving darling. Robert is number one son and therefore immune to any criticism or punishment. However, her other son, Patrick, my sister Bronnie and I, we are all under ten and therefore under her complete jurisdiction.

So every day after school, Bronnie, Patrick and I get up to mischief and then try to stop Yee Mah finding out. On the weekends there are more cousins, aunties and uncles to visit, most of whom aren’t even related to us. The hope is that some of their Chineseness will rub off on us and Bronnie and I will become bright, smart vessels and alleviate some of my mother’s disgrace.

Bronnie and I never quite blend in, but our new playmates are always too polite to mention it until one day, Erica storms out of the playground.

‘Australians are retard-ed,’ she says churlishly. Erica is seven years older than me and I worship her. She is everything a good girl should be: smart, respectful, and her boyfriends buy her large stuffed animals that I secretly covet.

There’s a rhyme going around the playground. The kids pull up the corners of their eyes, then pull them down, chanting: ‘Chinese, Japanese, hope your kids turn Pickanese.’ On ‘Pickanese,’ they lift one eye up and one eye down, giving the clear impression of mental retardation. Like all bad jokes that come into fashion, this one is going around like wildfire, and Erica has apparently been socked with it 150 times during lunch.

As we wait outside school for Yee Mah, I catch Erica giving me a sideways look, as though she is seeing me for the first time, realising that I look more like one of them than like her.

‘Yeah,’ I quickly say. ‘Australians are dog shit. Their babies will all eat dog shit and die.’

I have to be liberal with the faeces because the week before, my cousin Victor was bashed at the 7Eleven in Maroubra. A local gang was targeting Asians, and a couple of them beat up Victor and stole his bike. I saw him staggering down the road, bleeding from his nose with scrapes along his arms. The cheekbone beneath his eye was swollen and red, like a ripe fruit about to burst.

There is also a rumour going around that Asian-haters have been stabbing Asians with syringes full of AIDS blood in the cinemas on George Street. As a result, we don’t go to the cinema for at least a year.

Yee Mah’s car pulls up and we all climb in. Erica doesn’t speak to me for the rest of the day. Without knowing why, I am ashamed.

Every Saturday, about twenty of our ‘inner circle’ go to yum cha. The children are fed cha siu bao pork buns to fill us up so we don’t eat any of the expensive stuff, while the grown-ups brag about themselves by bragging about their children.
‘Patrick just passed his Grade Seven piano exam,’ says Yee Mah. ‘And Erica is top of her class. Again.’

Aunty Helen talks about Jasmine’s new office in the World Trade Centre and David’s internship.

And my poor mother sits with nothing to say. No awards we have won. No praise from our teachers. No marks high enough for medical or law school. It is the ultimate aspiration for any Chinese mother to have a child who is a lawyer or a doctor. The best-case scenario would be a lawyer who defends doctors in court.

‘You would make such a good barrister,’ my mother sometimes tells me. ‘You and that slippery tongue of yours.’

Such two-faced compliments are the staple of my existence. ‘Ho liang,’ my relatives say. ‘How pretty.’ But I always sense another implication: at least I am pretty, because there isn’t much else going for me.

Even worse, Bronnie wants to be an actress and I want to be a writer. My mother can’t think of anything less likely to lead to one of us buying her an apartment.

‘You’ll end up penniless in an attic,’ she tells my sister. As for me, she clips out cuttings from the newspaper to prove that most writers end up dead of starvation in the gutter.

To twist the chopstick even deeper, I am developing an aversion to school. In class, I am miserable, churlish and awkward. I don’t have any friends, and a boy called “派特里克刚刚过了钢琴7级，”姨妈说，“艾瑞卡呢，又是班级第一。”

海伦阿姨说着杰丝敏在世贸中心的新办公室和戴维的实习工作。

我可怜的妈妈坐在那无话可说。我们什么奖都没得，从没被老师表扬过，成绩也不够上医学院或者法学院。所有中国母亲的愿望就是有个当律师或者医生的孩子。最好的情况就是当一个在法庭上为医生辩护的律师。

“你肯定能当个好律师，”妈妈有时这么对我说，“你和你的那张快嘴。”

这种虚假的夸赞贯穿了我的人生。“好靓啊，”亲戚们说。但我总看到另外一层意思：幸好我长得好看，因为除此之外我一无是处。

不仅如此，布露尼想当个演员，而我想当个作家。妈妈想让我们俩其中一个给她买套公寓的愿望就必然要泡汤了。

“你会穷死在阁楼里的。”她告诉妹妹。而对于我，她会从报纸上收集文章向我证明大部分作家都会饿死在阴沟里。

“锦上添花”的是，我越来越厌恶学校。课堂让我感到痛苦、暴躁和不安。我没有任何朋友，一个叫
Owen throws rocks at me after class. There is another charming game going around the playground in which you pinch someone and say, ‘Tip, you’ve got the germs.’

I am always the original source of the germs.

Finally, to escape being the human turd, I lock myself in the school toilets for three hours. When a teacher comes to find me, I tell her I’ve been vomiting. Half an hour later my mother pulls up outside school and drives me back to our apartment. She cooks me chicken soup with noodles and wraps the bed sheets around me so tight I feel like I am in an envelope, about to be posted somewhere exotic. I love the garlic and chilli smell of her hands. She takes my temperature and smooths my forehead and continually asks if I am all right.

I suffer another week through the germ game until I lock myself in the toilet again. This time, Yee Mah picks me up from school.

‘What’s wrong with you?’ she demands.

‘I threw up in the toilet.’

‘You don’t smell like vomit,’ she says suspiciously.

‘It was only a little bit.’

She looks at me slyly from the corner of her eye.

‘Do you know why your mother is poor?’

I shake my head.

‘Because of you. She has to pay your school fees, very expensive. You see how tired she is? You must pay her back with

欧文的男生在下课时会朝我扔石头。当时在操场上还流传着另外一个“有趣”的游戏，掐别人一下然后说“喂，你身上有细菌。”

而我总是那个细菌的源头。

最后，为了不做人类病原体，我把自己关在厕所3个小时。老师找到我时，我告诉她我吐了。半个小时之后妈妈到学校接我，开车带我回家。她给我煮了鸡汤面条，用被子把我裹得紧紧的，像个要寄到远方的包裹。我喜欢闻她手上的蒜味和辣椒味。她量了我的体温，摸着我的额头，不停地问我有没有好一点。

我又忍受了一周的细菌游戏，直到我把自己再次关在厕所里。这一次，姨妈来学校接我。

“你怎么搞的？”她质问我。

“我在厕所吐了。”

“你闻起来不像吐过。”她怀疑地说。

“只吐了一点点。”

她用余光瞄我。

“你知道为什么你妈妈这么穷吗？”

我摇摇头。

“因为你啊。她要付你的学费，可贵了。你没看到她多累吗？
good marks. Otherwise you will make her shamed.’

The emotional terrorism continues until we get to her house. There is no chicken soup or tucking into bed. I have to sit on the couch with Bobo, her mother-in-law, for six hours, watching daytime television until my sister and Patrick come home.

‘Mum,’ I tug on my mother’s arm during Saturday yum cha as she chews on a prawn dumpling, part of yet another meal she can’t pay for. She looks down at me absentmindedly. ‘Mum!’

‘Yes, sweetheart?’

‘Can you buy me that fish?’

‘What?’

There are over fifty brim stuffed in the tank of the yum cha restaurant. They are squashed so tight together they can hardly move. In the middle there is a beautiful golden one, with scales that shimmer in the light of the crystal chandeliers. I want my mother to buy it so I can take it to Bondi Beach in a plastic bag and set it free in the ocean.

‘Don’t be stupid,’ my mother says. ‘They are for eating.’

The eating habits of my sister and I are yet another source of embarrassment. We are very wasteful. We don’t eat chicken’s feet. We don’t suck the jelly out of fish eyeballs and we refuse to eat the creamy filling inside prawn heads.

‘Just that one. Plee-eeeeease.’

‘No.’

‘Why?’

‘Why?’
'We can’t afford it,’ she hisses.

I let go of her hand and catch up with my sister and Patrick, who are playing in the elevators. We like to go into the elevators and push all the buttons. Go all the way up. Go all the way down. Occasionally, we get out on a floor we aren’t supposed to be on and run up and down the corridors.

It doesn’t bother me that we are poor. I’ve found a way to combat it – I steal from other children. When I get kicked out of class for misbehaving, which is often, I rifle through the school bags of all the other kids and steal their lunch money, as well as anything else I like.

When I finally get caught, I’m terrified Yee Mah will burn off my tongue like she’s always threatening. Instead, my mother sits me down at the dining-room table. She is very quiet. She puts her hand on my hand and says, ‘What do other children have that you don’t?’

If I were smarter, I would hear her heart breaking.

‘Erasers with Snow White on them,’ I say without hesitating.

‘All right,’ says my mother. ‘Go to your room.’

As I leave, I see her bow her head, as if she’s carrying a great burden. It’s shame. And she’s not ashamed of me, she’s ashamed of herself. For failing to teach me the difference between right and wrong. For failing to make me feel like I am warm and safe and don’t need to steal from other kids to make up for everything I don’t have.
The next day, the Snow White erasers are on the dining-room table. I don’t even want them.

When I finally ring my mother to tell her my HSC score, she sounds delighted.

‘You got 88.8? Very lucky number. You will be rich for sure.’

There is an odd note in her voice, one of momentary regret. That this isn’t the moment when I exceed all her expectations.

‘Very rich,’ she says again, as if to comfort herself with an ancient Confucian wisdom: Just think how it could have been worse.

As for me, I’ve given up hoping she will tell me she is proud. I no longer begrudge my friends their mothers who overflow with constant affirmation and nurturing encouragement. When she criticises me with all the sensitivity of a Japanese scientist harpooning a whale, and I feel the slow-burning resentment building to rage, I bite my slippery tongue.

Instead, I fossick through my memory for one of my earliest recollections.

My mother is in the kitchen. Steam rises from the wok and oil spatters over her hands. There is a delicious smell of soy sauce, garlic and chicken. She tips the contents of the wok into a dish, then spoons out chicken wings onto beds of rice. Chicken wings are the cheapest part of a chicken. She has bought all her salary can afford.

On my sister’s plate there are two. On mine there are two. On hers, there is two.

第二天，饭桌上放着一个白雪公主橡皮。但我根本不想要。

当我终于打电话告诉妈妈我的高中毕业考试成绩时。她听起来很高兴。

“你得了88.8分？很吉利的数字。你以后肯定会发财的。”

她的声音听起来有些异样，有着一闪而过的遗憾。此刻我并没有超越她的期望值。

“发大财。”她重复道，似乎在用古老的儒家智慧来安慰自己：知足常乐。

我已经不再期待能够听见她说为我感到骄傲，我不再羡慕朋友们，他们的妈妈总是怀着爱意和鼓励。而我妈妈像日本科学家捕杀鲸鱼一般，极其敏锐地批评我。我感到内心的忿恨升至愤怒，我闭住了我的快嘴。

相反，我在记忆的最深处搜寻。

母亲在厨房里。锅里蒸汽腾飞，油星溅到了她的手上。空气中混合着酱油、大蒜和鸡肉的香味。她把炒锅里的菜倒进盘子，把鸡翅舀到饭上。鸡翅是鸡身上最便宜的部位。她用上了全部薪水，也只能买得起这些。

妹妹的盘子里有两块鸡翅，我

And in her sacrifice, I see love.
